SYNOPSIS

Jack Brookfield, keeper of a high-class gambling establishment in Louisville, Ky., is possessed of extraordinary telepathic and hypnotic powers, by means of which he dominates his fellow men. A sweetheart of his younger days, Helen, now Mrs. Whipple and a widow, with a son named Clay, takes up her residence in Louisville. She renews her acquaintance with Brookfield and the old love reawakens. Helen and Clay attend a party given in her honor at Brookfield's apartments. For generations the Whipple descendants have been obsessed by a strange dread of the sight of a cat's eye. Tom Denning, while intoxicated, frightens Clay with a large cat's eye stick pin which he is wearing. Clay endeavors to avoid Denning, who follows him from room to room, until Clay slays him. District Attorney Hardmuth, whose suit for the hand of Viola Campbell, Brookfield's niece, is opposed by the latter, prosecutes Clay, obtaining a verdict of guilty and a death sentence. An appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States follows. A letter written by George Prentice, one of the Supreme Court Justices, to Mrs. Whipple's mother is found by Helen. In this Prentice refers to having fought a duel with a man who had terrorized Helen's mother with a cat's eye. Prentice agrees to give testimony to this effect in the second trial, and he and Brookfield strive by means of telepathy to transmit to the jury a suggestion that Clay should be acquitted. Brookfield forces a confession from Raynor, a broken down gambler, that Hardmuth hired him to murder Governor Scoville. Hardmuth is now a candidate for chief executive of the State. Brookfield telephones the news of Hardmuth's complicity in the crime to the newspapers, believing that the mental reaction in the minds of the people will influence the jury in the Clay case. The plan succeeds and a "Not Guilty" verdict is rendered. Brookfield feels that he is in some measure responsible for Scoville's murder, he having thought of a way in which the governor could easily be slain, and unconsciously transmitted a mental suggestion to that effect to Hardmuth's receptive mind. Having first cured Clay of his mental weakness regarding the sinister effect of a cat's eye, Brookfield sends him to Hardmuth's hiding place and between them they help him to escape. Clay's display of new courage wins the heart of Viola Campbell, and Helen and Brookfield are united.
